

CHURCHES OF CHRIST NSW

Occasional Papers in History and Theology, No. 6.

JOHN STRANG

THE STRANGE CASE OF JOHN STRANG

Harold Hayward

January 2014

The Churches of Christ in NSW will consider for publication short papers on historical and theological topics relevant to the development of Churches of Christ. The publication of a paper does not constitute an official endorsement of the views expressed therein.

John Strang (1843-1904)

John Strang was one of several British evangelists who came to Australia in the nineteenth century to assist in the establishment of churches. After short ministries in Britain, he accepted an appointment in 1874 to the remote township of Strathalbyn, in South Australia. Strang returned to England in 1876 but was sufficiently encouraged by what he saw in Australia to return in 1878. However, worn out by the relentless pace of short ministries, he sadly became disillusioned. This is his story.

Training

In the second half of the 19th century, several British evangelists came to Australia and assisted in the formation and development of Churches of Christ. Among these was John Strang. Born in Linlithgow, Scotland 1843, Strang grew up as a member of the Free Church of Scotland, later joining the Baptist Church, then the Churches of Christ. Strang's move from the Baptist Church to Churches of Christ was likely a seamless one and may have been influenced by his association with T.H. Milner, as Strang had joined a ministerial training class led by T.H. Milner in 1863 under the auspices of the Scottish Churches of Christ Annual Meeting. On Milner's death in 1866, this scheme was combined with one conducted by David King in Birmingham and Strang transferred to it. He spent three years under the tutelage of Milner, and one year with King.

At the time, associated Churches of Christ in Britain were going through a process of internal debate about the nature of theological college-based training, and about the nature of ministry itself. The need for trained clergy was increasingly recognized, but there was some opposition to the idea of a centralised theological college. Moreover, the prevailing view on ministry was that it should be based around evangelists who stayed with a church for a brief time, and then moved on. Local churches remained under the control of lay elders.

Image: John Strang

This appeared to many as the rightful apostolic model. The training institutes established by Milner and King were an accommodation to these ideas. Trainees went through a kind of internship: combining teaching by a prominent leader and ministry experience via attachment to a local congregation. Whilst attached to King, Strang was engaged as an evangelist to work among the Birmingham and district churches. Watters noted that only men of talent completed the full program, whilst lesser talents returned to local churches “to render improved service”¹. In light of this, Strang was probably recognised as having ‘good ministerial potential.’

The Influence of Milner and King

Thomas Hugh Milner was an interesting character. Born in 1825, he was baptised at the Bristo Scotch Baptist church, Edinburgh in 1842.² The Scotch Baptists differed from the more Calvinistic (i.e., predestinationist) English Baptists, espousing some ideals cherished by Restoration Movement³ churches, including the centrality of the Lord’s Supper and the desire to base faith and practice on the New Testament. It is likely Strang was initially numbered with the Scotch Baptists, hence the relative seamlessness of his transition to Churches of Christ. Milner then broke with the Scotch Baptists, and along with his followers formed an independent congregation which later linked up with Churches of Christ. With Milner came a new journal, The Christian Advocate (1857)⁴. Through this, and his preaching, Milner became very influential.

Image: T.H. Milner, mentor to John Strang, visited Australia in 1862 (Source: Maston p. 154)

Image: David King, editor in British Churches of Christ. (The Stone-Campbell Movement: A Global History, p.98)

David King, along with Milner, was one of the most influential churchmen of the period. King took over the editorship of the British Millennial Harbinger in 1861. According to Thompson, under its previous editor, Wallis, the Harbinger had been “almost single-handedly responsible for ensuring the continued propagation of Alexander Campbell’s writings”. King gave the Harbinger a more British slant aiming to “reproduce the thoughts of Brethren here.”⁵

For the next decade or so, the Harbinger with its British focus was the main source of information for fledgling Churches of Christ in Australia. It was through this publication that the writings of the Campbells became known in Australia.⁶ The decade of 1855-1865 was one of growth in Churches of Christ in Britain (particularly in Scotland through accessions from the Scotch Baptists) and the development of its associational institutions. Strang was trained against the background of these debates and the early optimism about church growth. His association with King left a great impression on him and may have influenced the later directions his ministry took.

In a letter to King, Strang wrote:

Your kind and encouraging bearing towards me when a student, your generous hospitality, and the progress I was able to make in fitness for the Master's service, under your instruction, or supervision, have laid in me a debt of gratitude, which I may have failed in any adequate degree of knowledge but which I have never ceased to feel. Ever since that memorable September 24th, 1866, your life and work have led me to regard you as, as presenting for my imitation, the purest and greatest human examples...⁷.

Between 1867 and 1874, Strang had ministries at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Carlisle, Liverpool (two years) and Glasgow (three years).

Early Ministry in Australia

In 1874, Strang came to Australia, following the path of several notable British evangelists, including: Matthew Wood Green, Samuel Halstaff Coles, William Hindle, George Greenwell, and Joseph Pittman. The influence of the British itinerant preachers on Churches of Christ in Australia was incalculable. The British connection was a natural one with some early members having been members of British churches. T.H. Milner himself briefly visited Australia in 1862, and it may be that Milner's favourable account of this visit inspired Strang to also come to Australia.

Strang's first appointment was to the church at Strathalbyn, South Australia. A warm welcome partially compensated him for damage to his library during a rough sea crossing. The Australian Christian Pioneer reports his arrival as follows:

On Tuesday evening 22nd inst. [September 1874] tea and public meetings were held here to welcome Bro. John Strang, evangelist, from Glasgow to his new field of labour in Strathalbyn and surrounding districts. About 200 sat down for tea, in the new chapel, which was tastefully decorated for the occasion... The chairman, [T. Magarey] said he could not but look upon Strang's coming as but a providential answer to their prayers. He had heard of Strang for years; and Bro. Gore who had met him in England had always spoken of him with great respect.⁸

Despite this grand start, Strathalbyn would not have been an easy ministry, having been without an evangelist for several years. Strathalbyn was a developing country area approximately 100 kms southeast of Adelaide. During Strang's time, it was linked in a circuit with the churches at Point Sturt and Milang. It was thus a widely spread community.

Image: A view of Strathalbyn c.1869 with the recently opened St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church (Source: National Library of Australia)

Strang visited and preached at other churches in South Australia. On 29 March 1875, he attended a meeting at the Grote Street church and participated in the decision to set up the Evangelistic Union of Churches of Christ in South Australia. The object was to mobilise the resources of the stronger churches to help weaker “languishing country churches.”⁹ This was one of the first entirely cooperative efforts in South Australia,¹⁰ mirroring cooperative efforts emerging in Britain. The development of such enterprises in Australia distinguished Churches of Christ in Australia from the movement in the USA, which initially eschewed associations which appeared “denominational.”

Strang returned to England in 1876 after spending a little time Melbourne, where he had had the opportunity of visiting the churches at Hotham (North Melbourne) and Castlemaine. In a letter to the Ecclesiastical Observer,¹¹ Strang wrote with some enthusiasm about improvements to his health and the “... good work being done in the colonies”. Nevertheless, he sounded a few warnings. He expressed concern that a heavy emphasis on “additions” was leading to an “over sensationalism in preaching” and a failure to enunciate “first principles.” Ominously, in the light of subsequent developments in his career, Strang observed:

Moreover, this feverish desire for additions too often leads churches to estimate the value of the evangelist by the number of baptisms reported, than which nothing could be more false and misleading.¹²

The problem identified by Strang continued into the 20th century. It is a hazard of local church autonomy in evangelical churches. Its corollary is that ambitious preachers might seek ministries in situations where they are likely to be successful in “adding numbers” rather than going into ministry situations where they were most needed.

Return to England

Back in England, Strang linked to the Midlands division of Churches of Christ based on Leicester. Between 1876 and 1878 he had ministries in thirteen churches. This was not inconsistent with the role of evangelist as currently perceived, but it was a punishing program for man a man of indifferent health. It is perhaps not surprising that he sought to return to Australia. Nonetheless, during this time in England, he married Janet Haldane. Her family background is unknown, but she may have been related to brothers Robert (1764–1842) and James Haldane (1768–1851). The Haldane family became leaders of a large independent congregation, and their theology greatly influenced the young Alexander Campbell in Glasgow. It is noted that Strang's mentor, Thomas Milner, had once been a member of a "Haldane/Baptist" congregation in Edinburgh which joined Churches of Christ.¹³

Strang in Sydney

John Strang and his wife, Janet, moved to Sydney in April 1878, entering ministry at the Sydney (Elizabeth Street) church. Not long after their arrival, Strang attended a lecture given by the Rev. James Jefferis LLB¹⁴ in the Protestant Hall in nearby Castlereagh Street. Strang was impressed by the lecture, which was later published in the magazine of the YMCA under whose auspices it had been given, and was prompted to write to the Australian Christian Pioneer (one of several colonial journals of Churches of Christ in Australia), giving an account of the lecture and his reaction to it. Strang's letter contained a long extract from Jefferis's lecture which opened with the following words:

If I were asked to give the chief causes of the present alienation of the workers from modern Christendom, I would be inclined to attribute to defective modes of worship, to wrong methods of teaching, and above all to a want of genuine spirit of brotherhood which ought to be found in the Christian Church in a higher degree than anywhere on earth.¹⁵

By way of elaboration, Jefferis argued that the wearing of vestments, the use of ecclesiastical trappings, theatrical posturings and the like were alien to ordinary people. In the "free" churches, there was tendency for them to degenerate into "one-man shows" where ministers became the sole mouthpiece of the congregation and preaching was often an elaboration of what the Scripture said more succinctly. There was a failure to educate and develop the talents of the whole congregation and equip it to deal with problems of the modern world. Jefferis' warnings about defective modes of worship, wrong methods of teaching and the want of a genuine spirit of brotherhood would resonate with many in Churches of Christ today.

Certainly, Strang was extremely impressed. Much of Jefferis's lecture fitted well with his Restoration Movement aspirations (particularly a belief in the "priesthood of all believers") but Strang deplored the fact that Churches of Christ were not actually practising their claimed ideals. "We have not risen, as a brotherhood, to a true appreciation of our distinctive principles," he wrote, "as a consequence, these they have often been unworthily represented." His view was that reading and reflection among members should be strongly encouraged to enable members to better address life's problems (rather than rely on a ministerial mouthpiece), and that the talents and "gifts" of all should be utilised in the furtherance of the gospel [citing 1 Cor.14]. Strang spent five years at the Sydney Church (April 1878 –

May 1883), the longest ministry of his career in Churches of Christ. This interlude gave him the opportunity to serve as a pastor and a teacher, ministries which were closest to his heart.

“Never far away when the brethren were busy”

An account by John Lockley Jnr. of a working bee at the Sydney church provides a quaint insight into Strang as a pastor. It seems that during in the 1870's the Sydney church decided to stop using fermented wine in their weekly communion services. The problem was where to find supplies of fresh grape juice. A source of grapes was located at Fairfield and every year, a working bee was held in the Elizabeth Street chapel to squash the grapes, boil the mix, strain off the pith and seed, and bottle sufficient extract to last for the ensuing year. This work was largely done by the women of the church. In his account of the annual “Day of the Winemaking,” Lockley recalls the main participants:

Few men came to the winemaking ... Mrs. Strang and her Maggie would come after the Haleys [previous minister and his wife] went to New Zealand. And I think old John Strang came along during the afternoon and had a look at things through his glasses. He was never far away when the brethren were busy.¹⁶

It was hardly fair to call John Strang “old” at that stage - he was barely forty years of age - but with greying hair, glasses perched on the end of his nose and a rather studious disposition, he might have appeared that way to the young Lockley.

Image: The original meeting house of Sydney Church of Christ in Elizabeth Street¹

For all his pastoral interests, Strang continued to “do the work of an evangelist”. The surviving records of the Sydney church reveal many baptisms during the five years he was at there. Henry Exley passing through Sydney around 1880, commented:

Sydney is not an easy field ... but the church has the good providence of having for its evangelist John Strang ... a man loved and esteemed by all who knew him.¹⁷

Strang's time in Sydney was arguably the most enjoyable of his ministry with Churches of Christ, providing an opportunity to raise his young family in a settled situation. One of his last acts before leaving Sydney was to perform the wedding of Marcus Clark and Pattie Day at the old Newtown

Chapel. Marcus Clark subsequently headed one of Sydney's largest retailing chains.ⁱⁱ The Newtown Chapel was sold in 1884 and the church relocated to Enmore.

Leadership Roles in Melbourne

In June 1883, Strang moved to Cheltenham church in Victoria. He was the Conference essayist in 1884 when he addressed the subject of "the Fundamental Plea of the Disciples" [of Christ]. The Conference essay was intended to be a "state of the movement" discussion. In June 1885, he moved to the inner-city church of Lygon Street, following eminent preachers such as J.J. Haley and G.B. Moysey. Lygon Street, one of the "mother churches" in Victoria, was still basking in the afterglow of the glory years of H.S. Earl when every Sunday night brought forward many "decisions for Christ". In 1887, Strang was elected as President of the Victorian Conference which was held at the Swanston Street chapel that year. He served again as President in 1888, the Conference being held in the nearby Lygon Street Chapel. The office of Conference President was regarded as the highest representational office in the state.

Back to Being a Field Evangelist

In 1888, Strang returned to being a field evangelist under the auspices of the Victorian Home Missions Department. He continued in that capacity through 1888 to 1892. During that time, he served churches at Bairnsdale, Wimmera, South Melbourne, Wedderburn, Traralgon, Surrey Hills and in Corowa, NSW. How he managed to cope with the constant moving, the stress of outreach preaching, and the demanding (and sometimes unrealistic) requirements of local churches can only be imagined. However, he found time to deliver the Conference sermon in 1890 on the subject of "The Law of Development as Seen in the Kingdom of God". At that Conference, five churches were admitted to Conference, including one in the NSW border town of Corowa.

Events at Corowa, NSW

Corowa Church of Christ resulted from the decisions by two residents to seek baptism (immersion). This followed an intensive study of scripture. There being no immersionist communion locally, the two men decided to travel to Melbourne to be baptized. There was no indication that they had any previous background in Churches of Christ. The story, related somewhat triumphantly in the *Jubilee Pictorial History*¹⁸ was that when one of the men fell sick and was unable to make the journey, they communicated with F. Illingworth, a leading Churches of Christ layman, in Melbourne. Illingworth arranged for W.D. Little (a Home Missions evangelist) to go to Corowa to receive the duo's confession of faith and to baptize them. They were baptised in the Murray River on 31 March 1889. Immediately afterwards, the Lord's Table was set up in an unused store belonging to Charles Johnson, one of the new converts. Little stayed for a short time in Corowa, and it seems that the numbers grew. In 1890, the new church felt sufficiently confident to apply to the Associated Churches of Christ in Victoria for admission to their Conference.

Image: Christian Tabernacle Corowa NSW (photo: Maston, 1903 p332)

John Strang was appointed as a Home Mission evangelist to the church in 1891. His licence to perform marriages was gazetted in NSW in September that year.¹⁹ Charles Johnson subsequently lent money for the purchase of land and the erection of a meeting place (the Christian Tabernacle – see photo). Later, the church linked to the Associated Churches of Christ in NSW, the authority to which Corowa properly belonged. But this was after Strang's time there. For Strang, his time at Corowa became the catalyst for some long-standing concerns.

Petition to the Presbyterian Church of Australia

In March 1892, Strang applied to the Presbytery of Wagga Wagga for admission as a Minister of the Presbyterian Church of Australia. In support of his petition, Strang supplied references and documents from the following:

1. The deacons of the Christian Chapel, Elizabeth Street, Sydney.
2. Cheltenham Victoria Church of Christ.
3. Officers of Lygon Street, Carlton, Church of Christ.
4. Home Missions Committee of the Churches of Christ in Victoria.

The Wagga Wagga Presbytery resolved to recommend Strang's petition to the General Assembly with request that the General Extension Committee provide employment for Mr. Strang until the decision of the Assembly was known. Strang resigned from his ministry at Corowa and was sent to the Presbyterian Church at Woodburn on the Richmond River in northern NSW. This parish covered a fairly large geographical area and was in a rundown condition. His petition was presented at the General Assembly twelve months later with an enthusiastic endorsement of the Woodburn elders and 164 members and adherents. The General Assembly accepted the petition, exempting Strang from serving the usual (three months) probationary period on the grounds that he had seen serving for nearly twelve months with the (Presbyterian) Church Extension Committee.

Why the Change?

Strang was trained in the heartland of Churches of Christ in England and Scotland and had served two terms as the President of the largest Conference authority of Churches of Christ in Australia. Based on his editorial work in The Australian Christian Standard and his addresses to Conferences and local churches, there can be no doubt about his commitment to the so-called Restoration Movement. So, what prompted this change so late in his vocation?

For much of his ministry, he had served in pioneering roles in churches which were in crisis, where local support systems were inadequate, and fundamental Christian education had not occurred. Teaching in rented halls, baptizing in town waterholes, and ministering to start up churches might have seemed apostolic - very Pauline - but it was hard work, and would have been particularly difficult for his wife, Janet and their daughter, Margaret Heather Strang.ⁱⁱⁱ There was no bishop, no “pastor to pastor” and often, no nearby colleagues to whom he could talk, and Strang was a gentle soul, and not very robust in health. Ministerial burnout was not recognised as a professional hazard for ministers until the mid-20th century. Strang had been in 20 demanding ministry situations – apart from casual preaching – in as many years. It was also clear that he was beginning to have serious concerns about some the directions and emphases he could see within Churches of Christ.

In his petition to the Wagga Wagga Presbytery, Strang offered the following explanation for his decision to apply to enter the Presbyterian ministry:

Work among the associated Churches is I regret to say, narrowing down to a sort of baptismal crusade, with the result that too often the people are converted to baptism rather than Christ. With me, the tendency has been to magnify the Saviour more and more as the sinner’s only hope. And from rigid views about that, I have come around to the belief that infant baptism rests on a scriptural basis and is adapted to a means of grace both to parents and children.²⁰

There are echoes here of comments he had made previously about Churches of Christ in Australia. “Magnifying the Saviour” is fully consistent with baptism into Christ, of course, and Strang would have recognised this. However, no Churches of Christ historian today would deny there was an element of rigidity in the way the message of salvation was sometimes presented, with immersion stressed as a point of exclusion, rather than faith in Christ as a point of inclusion. The situation at Corowa, where baptism (immersion) stood as the very rationale for the new church’s existence would not have helped. Baptismal regeneration has never officially been advocated by Churches of Christ: whilst the Churches of Christ today would still insist on the immersion of believers as the normative form of baptism, they would not deny the claims of others who professed their faith in Jesus as Lord and lived according to their profession. Essentially a movement for Christian unity, “Christians only, but not only Christians,” has been a dogma within the Restoration Movement since its beginnings.

Image: Reverend John Strang (Courtesy of Lightfoot, Ferguson Memorial Library. Source unknown)

Later Career

Strang settled in quickly to the more ordered conditions of a Presbyterian pastorate. In support of his petition to the General Assembly, the Woodburn congregation submitted the following:

The Rev. John Strang has now laboured in our midst for the past ten months with great acceptance; that he found the charge greatly disorganised and disheartened, but that through his energy, zeal and Christian tact he gathered the people around him again and has given us hope that that the cause at Woodburn has now entered upon a more healthy course; that his personal qualities have called forth our esteem and love for him as a minister of the gospel.²¹

Woodburn offered him a pastoral situation in which he could flourish. He continued in this parish until 1902 when it was decided to divide it. Strang opted to go to the new parish formed around Casino. There he seems to have been taken to heart by the townspeople. Unfortunately, Strang died about two years after the change (May 1904). He was only 63 years of age, leaving behind his wife Janet and their married daughter, Margaret Heather Wilson,^{iv} and her husband, Andrew Fitzstephen Wilson. An obituary advice on Strang prepared by the General Purposes Committee for the General Assembly recorded the following:

According to the uniform testimony of those who knew him, he was man of singularly quiet and peaceable disposition. He was a simple minded and modest man. He loved his people and loved his work among them. He was a faithful and able preacher, an affectionate pastor, full of concern for the spiritual interests of his people and doing his best to guard them evil and to guide them in the way of life. They venerated and loved him for his kindly and generous spirit and the beautiful consistency of his Christian character.

The Richmond River Times of 20 May 1904 recorded similar sentiments, referring also to the esteem with which he was held by all the community, and the high regard in which he was held by the ministers and members of all churches. The Times went on to describe Strang's funeral procession – led by the town band playing the “The Dead March in Saul” - followed by family members and a large range of officials, dignitaries and representatives, and about 60 vehicles and 50 horsemen. This was a magnificent response from a relatively small town, and an eloquent testimony to the esteem with which he was felt. Yet, one wonders what the “simple and modest” Strang might have made of it all? Strang had come a long way from his early beginnings in Scotland. Arguably, the loss to Churches of Christ was the gain of the Presbyterian Church. But the ultimate winner was the Kingdom of God. “Well done thou and good and faithful servant.” (Matt. 25:21)

REFERENCES

¹Watters. Ch. 4.

²Thompson, p.51.

³The name at one time given to the confluence groups aiming to restore the unity of church based on the (rather simplified) view they believed was reflected in the Testament. The term has been used occasionally in this monograph to avoid clumsy repetition of “Churches of Christ.”

⁴Thompson, p51.

⁵*Ibid* p 56.

⁶When Eliza Davies arrived at the Newtown church in 1857/8 bearing a letter of introduction from Alexander Campbell the members knew little about him. The little church’s main source of information had been the spasmodic arrival of copies of the British Millennial Harbinger.

⁷Collin (page unknown).

⁸Chapman, Vol. II p.303.

⁹Maston, p.69.

¹⁰There had been other limited cooperative efforts—see Maston, p69.

¹¹The new title David King had given to the British Millennial Harbinger in 1871. King was never particularly comfortable with the implications of the name Millennial Harbinger – see Watters. p80 ¹²Chapman, p.303.

¹³Williams, D. Newell et al., p.96.

¹⁴Jefferis was the progressive and influential minister of the nearby Pitt Street Congregational (now, Uniting Church). See entry in the Australian Dictionary of Biography - <http://adb.abu/biography/Jefferis-james-3853>. ¹⁵Quoted in “A Homily on a Text not Inspired” Australian Christian Pioneer 1878 in Chapman p.318 -319 ¹⁶Lockley, John Memories “Christian Messenger”, 21/4/1926. Lockley later became President of the then Ku ring-gai Shire and later a gardening journalist for The Sydney Morning Herald.

¹⁷Coop, T and Exley, H. p150.

¹⁸Maston, p. 332.

¹⁹*Sydney Morning Herald* 2/9/1891.

²⁰“Application from the Rev. John Strang to be received as a minister of the church” in Petition to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of NSW, 1893.

²¹Petition to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in NSW 1893.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chapman, G No Other Foundation: A Documentary History of Churches of Christ in Australia Volume I & II Mulgrave, self-published n.d.

Collin, J Memoirs of David King www.christianhomesite.com/belfast/text/David, n.d.

Coop, T. & Exley, H. 1882 A Trip Around the World H.C. Hall, Cincinnati.

Maston A.B. (ed) Jubilee Pictorial History of Churches of Christ in Australasia, Austral Publishing Co.: Melbourne. 1903.

Thompson, David M Let Sects and Parties Fall, Berean Press: Birmingham, 1980.

Williams, D. Newell et al. The Stone-Campbell Movement: A Global History, St. Louis: Chalice Press, 2013 Watters, A.C. History of the British Churches of Christ, Birmingham: Berean Press, 1948.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

The assistance of Daryl Lightfoot (Research Officer at the Ferguson Library, Archives of the Presbyterian Church in NSW) in supplying information on Strang's ministries with the Presbyterian Church is gratefully acknowledged.

ⁱ The building was sold in 1895 and converted for other uses. Photo was recently discovered in the City of Sydney archives.

ⁱⁱ You can read about Marcus Clark in Occasional Paper 2: <https://freshhope.org.au/news-resources/historical-documents-2/> ⁱⁱⁱ Ancestry search: Rev. John Strang; Janet Haldane, Margaret Heather Wilson (nee Strang) d, 1906, Eden NSW.

^{iv} See note about Ancestry search in footnote iii.